

Wolf Warrior Statecraft

Risk Management 05 May 2020

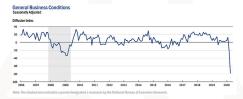

Stirling Larkin, CIO

Above and beyond the US Government announcing that they will begin nationalising US securities via stockmarkets beginning in May, the past week has seen an escalation in malevolent actions across the Indo-Pacific basin, tossing another spanner in the works by redoubling Sino-American tensions to a point nearing no safe return.

It is no secret that economic depressions bring political repercussions; 1929 spawn the rise of German and Italian Fascism, the rolling gloom across South America during the 1970's and 1980's gave way to Augusto Pinochet's military junta in Chile and the

So, it is not immaterial nor academic that rapidly increasing and acute economic pressure that encumbrance both US and Sino state actors, is leading to proxy tussles online and real-world manoeuvres terra firma and across the Pacific high seas.

If the Federal Reserve Bank of New York's (the same member bank who announced aforementioned US securities nationalisation) recently published general business conditions diffusion indice dived to these lows during the Corona Crunch double bottoming conditions witnessed during the nadir of the Great Recession (highlighted in grey) - it is almost inconceivable to consider what would happen next if Sino-American belligerence materialised.

Yesterday, retired Chinese Air Force Major General and now hawkish professor at the PLA National Defence University. Oiao Liang, said of Taiwanese military reoccupation, "China's ultimate goal is not the reunification of Taiwan, but to achieve the dream of national rejuvenation - so that all 1.4 billion Chinese can have a good life", which was clear Sir Humphrey Appleby'esque doublespeak for military reoccupation of Formosa (Taiwan).

Liang left no room for misinterpretation by adding, "Could it be achieved by taking Taiwan back? Of course not. So we shouldn't make this the top priority. If Beijing wants to take Taiwan back by force, it will need to mobilise all its resources and power to do this ... You shouldn't put all your eggs in one basket, it's too costly."

Such bellicose alone remains almost inconsequential to the global investor. especially during the era of Trump's Twitter, however, what is increasingly becoming consequential and material in yesterday's diatribe is the reinforcement of Sino pundits remarks by what is now dubbed, the Chinese "Wolf Warriors".

This aggressive new subterfuge, dubbed, "Wolf Warrior diplomacy" - named after a patriotic Chinese action film from 2017 in which a Chinese soldier saves the day in a series of adventures across Africa, (The film's popularity in China boosted it to become the highest-grossing non-English film ever) – has seen scores of Sino diplomats and embassies around the world open Twitter accounts over the past six months and many of them are now using this US hubbed social media platform to post accusations, boasts and name-calling directed at state actors and individuals they feel have blighted China.

Subsequently, Air Major Liang's assertion, went from being an isolated remark to a pseudo diplomatic communiqué, despite the irony that he first came to national notoriety for publishing the 2004 book, "Unrestricted Warfare: China's Master Plan to Destroy America", which was first thought to counter arguments accruing towards the rising tide of Sino nationalism.

Beyond online hubris, this past week saw a coalescence of digital agitations very coincidentally lining up with impromptu regional skirmish's and also methodically planned forthright manoeuvres.

Purposely timed to coincide with Tuesday, 3 November 2020's US Presidential elections, Běijīng this week publicly announced that it was 'carefully considering' unveiling the Xian H-20 supersonic stealth bomber plane at the Zhuhai Airshow in early November at a time of heightened regional tension.

The appearance of the bomber at this year's air show could heighten tensions by directly threatening countries within its strike range, especially Australia, Japan and the Korean peninsula.

If that wasn't enough, the Chinese Liaoning aircraft carrier strike group completed Formosan Strait exercises, in what was thought to be an obvious attempt at putting pressure on Taiwan's pro-independence forces, with the strike group sailing through the strait countering America's unprecedented navigation twice through the strait, recently flagged in our Anticipating China's Second COVID-19 Wave update.

Last week also saw new Chinese nuclear submarines set sail, perfectly timed to cruise past the Liaoning strike group (we know this because of the boastings of mainland Wolf Warriors).

Beyond nationalist chest-beating, the truly concerning escalation this past week was statements from US officials that a new generation of ground-launched, intermediate-range missiles to trade for continue over

reductions in the thousands of Chinese dual-capable, intermediate-range missiles were now being considered, alongside other American policymakers pushing to codevelop missiles with Asian allies.

Hawks have been increasingly urging Trump to deploy US missiles in Asia, suggesting it would offset Chinese systems on the battlefield.

Cite:- DOD Conducts Ground Launch Cruise Missile Test, 19 August 2019

Cite:- Levelling The Playing Field: Reintroducing US Theatre-Range Missiles In A Post-INF World, 2019

Beyond Hong Kong facing the spectre of their worst recession ever, amid the COVID-19 global pandemic, China reported negative year-over-year growth of GDP for the first time since 1992, when the National Bureau of Statistics started to release economic growth numbers on a quarterly basis

Cite:- Hong Kong Affects Backend
Of Australian Wealth Management, 4
December 2019

Cite:- Goodbye Hong Kong, 19 April 2020 The real GDP growth declined 6.8 percent year-over-year, worse than market pundits expected.

In terms of policies, the Chinese government is on the track of a gradual escalation in its stimulus policies, though it is widely accepted that the virus cannot be 'bought off'.

Given the high uncertainties in the global economy, the Chinese authorities might tolerate a lower growth rate this year and a specific growth target might not be set as usual during the annual session of the National People's Congress, which is delayed and likely to be convened in May.

Instead, stability in employment might become the top policy priority for this year and against this background, the People's Bank of China, or PBoC, might continue to follow a data-driven approach in its policies and have further cuts to policy rates and required reserve ratios when economic data reveal a worsening outlook.

But recognising that Trumponics is stumbling five months out from all-important US Presidential elections and Ximonics' from its aspirational goals set within, 'Made In China 2025', it is rational to question whether Presidents Trump and Xí will follow the all too familiar path of militarily striking out just before key political crossroads.

'Disinformation narratives' and petulance is one thing but a Sino-American hot war would spell a terminal blow for financial markets already afflicted by crises.

...it is almost inconceivable to consider what would happen next if Sino-American belligerence materialised

 \rightarrow

australianstandfirst.com

Anticipating China's Second COVID-19 Wave: Proactive Defensive Measures Taken By Australian Investors.

As the second of the second of

This information contained herein has been prepared and issued Australian Standfirst Asset Management Pty Ltd ACN 612 265 219 as an AFS Representative 1276948 of Australian Standfirst Funds Management Ltd ACN 618 083 079 AFSL 510315 and is provided for educational purposes only and should not be taken as advice. This is not an offer to buy/sell financial products. We do not provide personal advice nor do we consider the needs, objectives or circumstances of any individual. Financial products are complex and all entail risk of loss. The price and value of investments referred to in this research and the income from them may fluctuate. Past performance is not indicative offuture performance, future returns are not guaranteed and a loss of original capital may occur. Fluctuations in exchange rates could have adverse effects on the value or price of, or income derived from, certain investments. Certain transactions, including those involving futures, options, and over-the-counter derivatives, give rise to substantial risk as they are highly leveraged, and are not suitable for all investors. Please ensure you obtain, read and understand any applicable offer document.